SANTA CATALINA ISLAND

Twenty-two miles long, with an area of 40,000 acres, lies in the Pacific Ocean, off the coast of Southern California, three hours' travel from Los Angeles. At San Pedro one embarks on a modern steamer for one and one-half hour's sail on the blue-green waters of the Pacific. Soon appear a drove of flying fish saulting through the air, diving under water, quickly to reappear and continue their flight from the pursuit of the leaping tuna. School upon school of these marine wolf and lamb rush past the steamer's course. The tuna dart like so many silver arrows, suddenly turn over and descend upon their prey, sending others whirling into the air. The traveler has been so captivated by this unique spectacle that all at once he finds himself close to the outlines of the Catalina range, but recently the haunt of the mountain goat, now a resort for the traveler from afar and the Californian, summer and winter alike.

A natural sanitarium, in mid-winter a flower garden, in summer never uncomfortably warm, July temperature at Avalon averages 65°. Santa Catalina provides in the "Metropole" an excellent hotel of modern appointments, also smaller hostelries, cottages and boarding houses, beside the canvas city of the summer camp. There are golf links, fishing clubs, the great hunting preserve, bathing houses, a dancing pavilion, the famous coach ride over the mountains to the Isthmus, 14 miles, daily boat excursions and private yachting parties to the Sea Lion Rookery, the Sphinx, Mounts Orizaba and Black Jack, Moonstone Beach, etc. The Aquarium and Zoological Station present a remarkable display of living plants and animals of the surrounding sea. From the glass-bottomed boat may be seen the wonders of the Pacific deep, of aquatic life in its aborigine intimacy, untouched by the all-destroyer man—shell-encrusted rocks, gracefully balancing sea-weed, uncouth fish, red, green, orange, blue, gold, zigzagging leisurely among the foliage and weird reflections of the transparent bottom.

The newest among the attractions is the Island Mountain Railway. As you ascend the steep grade of the incline, so enhances the beauty and range of the vision, till at the summit the grandest panorama unfolds over the moon-shaped bay, the ocean and the many spurred mountain range of the island. Descending, the railway lands you at Lover's Cove, whence you may return to Avalon on foot, or over the marine gardens by the glass-bottomed boat.
